Re: Committee Markup of the American Privacy Rights Act (APRA) (H.R. 8818)

Dear Chairman McMorris Rodgers, and Ranking Member Pallone:

Financial institutions are strong proponents of protecting consumer data and consumer privacy because maintaining their trust is a cornerstone of their business. Financial institutions have also been subject to extensive and comprehensive federal privacy and data protection laws and regulations for several decades, which has played an important role in maintaining that trust.

While we support privacy and security protections for consumer data for all companies, especially technology and other firms that are increasingly moving into financial services, in our May 23, 2024, joint letter we expressed our concerns about the ambiguity of the Gramm-Leach-Bliley Act (GLBA) exception provided in the American Privacy Rights Act (APRA) Discussion Draft and advocated for clear language that provided an exception for entities subject to the GLBA. Unfortunately, this was not done, and we continue to have serious concerns about the APRA (H.R. 8818) and oppose the bill in its present form.

The primary privacy and data security consumer protection law for consumer financial data is Title V of the GLBA. With the GLBA, Congress carefully constructed a privacy and data security regime to provide an effective and successful balance between strong consumer protections and ensuring that consumer financial transactions take place in a safe and secure environment. In particular, the current regime has been carefully structured to ensure compliance with existing laws and regulations, adherence to judicial process, and protection from fraud, illicit finance, money laundering and terrorist financing.

Further, GLBA grants federal financial regulators with broad authority to adopt necessary regulations to enact these standards, thus allowing the regulatory regime to adapt over time as privacy concerns evolve. Such regulators also examine financial institutions for their compliance with privacy and data security requirements, and have the authority to bring enforcement actions against those institutions that are found to be out of compliance with these requirements. Notably, the GLBA requires that financial institutions provide consumers with notice of their privacy practices and generally prohibits such institutions from disclosing financial and other consumer information to third parties without first providing consumers with an opportunity to opt out of such sharing.

Congress has long recognized the importance of privacy for financial institutions and has put in place several meaningful frameworks that include strong privacy and data security protections that have been carefully balanced with commonsense exceptions to minimize disruptions to financial markets. While the financial services trade associations support legislation to put in place a national privacy standard, that standard must recognize the strong privacy and data security standards that are already in place for the financial sector under the GLBA and other financial privacy laws and avoid provisions that duplicate or are inconsistent with those laws.

As currently framed, Title I of APRA does not include clear language for financial institutions to understand their exemption from the requirements of the bill. Section 118(b)(3) only excludes “activities” governed by the GLBA, as opposed to exempting financial institutions subject to the GLBA. This will lead to duplicative and conflicting requirements for financial institutions already subject to oversight by GLBA regulation. As currently drafted, the bill would be disruptive to the financial system, consumers, and the economy.

We urge that Title I of the APRA be amended to exempt all financial institutions subject to the GLBA to avoid such disruption.

Sincerely,
